From the desk of the pastor...

The gospel teaches us to consider the relationship between words and deeds. We must strive to translate our noble promises into noble performances, to carry out our fine words into fine deeds. The gospel tells us that there are two very common types of people in this world. First, there are the people whose profession or words are much better than their practice. They thought that they are good because they followed all the laws. They will promise anything, make great protestations or solemn declaration of piety and fidelity. “I’m a catholic because I was baptized as a Catholic.” But their practice lags behind.

There was a book written by C. Mooney entitled To Hell On Monday. It depicts well the Christians who conform outwardly to the law, are seen regularly at Mass, offer the required contribution, belong to parish organizations and pay the dues, functioning on Sundays in a very conspicuous way. Then on Monday, he throws religion to the devil. The law of God is put into his back pocket and he forgets all about it in his marital relations, his sense of justice to his household servants and his sense of moral decency in the commandment (thou shalt not steal), in competitive business, he forgets there is an eight (thou shalt not bears false witness against your neighbour) commandment. Where is the Christian sense in this man? Is it in the pocket?

Second, there are those whose practice is far better than their words. They claim to be tough, hard-headed materialists, not attending Sunday Masses but somehow they are found out doing kindly and generous things almost in secret as if they were ashamed of it. They profess to have no interest in the Church and in religion and yet when it comes to the bit, they live more Christian lives than many professing Christians – Robin-hood style. “Action speaks louder than words.” Come to think of it.
